Our Work

Advocacy: SCCADVASA works to increase the awareness of how laws and policies impact the lives and healing of those survivors. We also play a vital role as a link between direct service providers, state legislators, and policy makers to amplify the voice of all survivors.

Education: We provide professional development training to increase knowledge, skills, and capacities for advocacy and direct service for survivors. We also work with community educators and others on violence prevention initiatives in schools and communities across S.C.

Collaboration: We proactively work with local programs, legislators, system partners, and the community at large towards our goal of ending domestic & sexual violence in S.C.

Although the figures reported below are substantial, they likely reflect only a portion of the domestic violence occurring in South Carolina. Many survivors do not report abuse due to fear, stigma, or limited access to support. Differences in how domestic violence is defined, along with fragmented and inconsistent reporting systems, further contribute to undercounting. Recent analysis suggests that at least 30% of aggravated domestic violence incidents go unreported to law enforcement. Underreporting is estimated to be even higher in cases of sexual violence.⁶
